What is the architectural transgression?

Architecture transgression – metaphorical and engineering crossing of architectural boundaries.

We can speak about two types of architectural transgression: permanent and temporary.

Temporary architecture of scout camps

The temporary architecture of the scout camps is built by scouts every year. Young people come to the forest and create many different structures that are necessary for life in the wild.

There is a certain pattern of what they should build, but the form a given structure takes depends on their creativity, imagination and construction skills. The youngest of them are ten or eleven years old.

Those who already have extensive experience decide to build effective and at the same time very time-consuming buildings.

The tradition of building in scout camps dates back to the beginnings of scouting in Poland (1911).
